Arts and Science Online – Courses Summer 2020

Preparation of the schedule for Summer 2020 online courses is still taking place. The Faculty of Arts & Science is reviewing the demand for specific courses, available instructors and approving the budget.

The expectation is that this process will be completed by the end of November and that the courses being offered will be posted on the above link.

Registration on SOLUS will not open until early February (usually the first Monday of the month). Please note the following.

- Registration is on a first-come basis.
- A block of seats in each course will be reserved for distance studies students only.
- If registration exceeds the number of seats available to on-campus students, the wait list will be available.
- If the wait list is full but is the number of seats on it is smaller than the number of available seats reserved for distance students, then the empty seats will become available at 12:01 a.m. on the first day of the Summer Term.

Lest We Forget

All classes are cancelled from 10:30 to 11:30, so that everyone may attend the Remembrance Day Service in Grant Hall.

The First and Second World Wars changed Queen's dramatically. Not only did thousands of students, alumni, staff, and faculty fight abroad - and more than 300 died in action -, but the face of life on campus itself was also transformed.

The First World War had the largest impact. When war began in 1914, there was a great outburst of patriotism in Canada and Queen's students enlisted in large numbers. Mass enlistment also meant a sharp decline in enrolment and income at Queen's and for some time, the university actually hovered on the edge of bankruptcy.

The university itself formed several of its own military units. Of these, the 46th Battery of Field Artillery, which served in France, and the No 5 (Queen's) Stationary Hospital, which served in Egypt and France, were comprised almost exclusively of Queen's students and faculty. French professor Peter Campbell also formed a special Queen's Highland Battalion, the 257th, but most people in the unit were not connected with the university.

Queen's people fought in many of the war's most famous battles, including Ypres, the Somme, and Vimy, and many wrote letters to the Queen's Journal describing their harrowing experiences. All told, 187 students and alumni were killed in action. Back on campus, all male students were required to take part in military training and Grant Hall and Kingston Hall were transformed into a military hospital.

Most women were involved in Red Cross work and the absence of so many men from campus had the effect of increasing their role at Queen's. Female academic staff were hired, for example, and women students were elected for the first time to the Alma Mater Society executive and to the Queen's Journal (see Charlotte Whitton).

The Second World War had a smaller impact on the university. The war thrust Queen's back into a similar world of military discipline and reduced expectations.

But the pace of enlistment was not so brisk, partly because the previous war had done away with many romantic notions of battle; as a result, Queen's did not face a major financial crisis. Students and alumni once again fought in the major battles of the western front, and often with distinction.

The campus was galvanized when, at Dieppe, the Rev John Weir Foote (Arts '33) won the Victoria Cross, the Commonwealth's top award for bravery. By war's end, 164 students and alumni had been killed in action. On campus, two of the war's main effects were to increase the amount of scientific research at the university and to boost medical education. The School of Nursing was founded in 1941, partly because of wartime needs.

The Memorial Room in the John Deutsch University Centre commemorates all students and alumni who died in the two wars.

Precarious Living: Syrians in Turkey

Approximately 5 million Syrians are currently displaced, living without adequate protection, and struggling to access residency, rights, and citizenship in the broader context of migration governance. This talk looks at the Turkish case of hosting Syrians to reflect on international and national commitments to refugee protection and the relation between precarity and refugees' everyday living. Under Turkey's temporary protection regime, Syrians are not recognized as refugees and only afforded the legal right to temporarily reside within Turkey. This presentation will discuss how temporary protection diminishes international protection to Syrians and increases their legal insecurities.

The University of Ottawa Healthcare Symposium (UOHS) is a one-day undergraduate healthcare conference with a goal of promoting student interest in the many aspects of healthcare. The conference is being held on Saturday, January 18th, 2020, and is an opportunity for students to learn about both the practical and research-based components of healthcare, as well as to explore the various interdisciplinary lenses within the Canadian healthcare system.

UOHS 2020 is looking for organized, reliable, and committed individuals to join our team as external ambassadors. With the growing success of UOHS in Ottawa, we would like to extend invitations to students across Canada to be part of the conference. Successful candidates will work in close proximity with the VP Externals to promote the conference on their respective campuses, and organize the logistics surrounding accommodation and transportation.

Please find the application on our website at <http://www.uohs-csuo.com/get-involved>.

Join us for the 19th annual Queen's Health and Human Rights Conference. We aim to unpack the complex interactions between the environment and human health with a particular focus on disproportionately impacted populations. Specific topics will include Northern and Indigenous health, technology, public policy, and advocacy relating to climate changes in local and global settings. The conference will feature workshops, panels, and a community fair, in hope to facilitate conversations on access to water, food sovereignty, and health-focused solutions. This conference is a multidisciplinary platform, so regardless of your field of study, you are welcome to attend and learn something new!

Tickets are free of cost!
